

Return to Forever

Has anyone wondered why so many Mayan ruins are being uncovered this year? My theory is that there are discoveries at large that are key to the prophesized polar shift of 2012. While many of the ruins in the Yucatan peninsula are already excavated, there is a timeline that exists for the uncovering of additional sites and information pertinent to the shift and its effect on humankind.

Scholars only broke the Mayan code in the last decade. Until that point, the meaning of any finding or encryption was only speculation. Now, however, numerous scholars are attempting to tie the coded stories into a cohesive history and, some, even into predictive findings of future astronomical events. The Mayan elders carry the meanings of these stories and their timekeepers hold the time codes. But the university mindset gives little credence to myth without evidence. Even with the evidence that they are finding written in the ruins themselves, without calculations that back up the information, the stories continue to be myths.

With the uncovering of new sites, at precise moments in time, information that might have been cast aside as myth in earlier times can now be looked at and evaluated more methodically. It can be tied into the complex web of Mayan mythology, using complex mathematics, physics, and astronomy -- sciences that were highly developed in Mayan culture but not available to scholars and scientists until recently. Where one or two references to math and astronomy might point to a given star or star system in the skies, many more references, which can now be cross-referenced and added to the puzzle, display a larger picture or scheme of past and future events -- with us, as the receivers and interpreters, representing the present.

Finding this evidence at a time when we were ill-prepared to interpret it, say before the incorporation of NASA or before current technology would allow us to see far into the stars, would have failed to produce a clear picture or understanding of what was or what is to come. It would be synonymous with Nostradamus trying to define future events such as flying machines, without having knowledge of such and thus, using obscure descriptions and definitions of events in the hope that someone would eventually crack the code and understand the message.

Now, however, we not only have the code but we have the science to evaluate and interpret the findings; some that will be very surprising and forthcoming in the near future. Only now can modern physics explain multidimensionality and nonlinear time using quantum theory. With this new knowledge as a tool, newly found information returns us to ancient information that was buried as a result of previous shifts. These findings, and our new technology and science, are helping to shed the veil and expose us to highly intelligent and complex configurations and predictions. These predictions point to the stars, our place of birth, and cosmic events of such great proportion that they only occur once every 26,000 year; following a complete precession of the equinox. However, this particular precession, on the winter solstice of 2012, will occur in conjunction with a polar shift, which happens even less frequently.

As more sites are uncovered and the information continues to come forth, we will be offered the codes to aid us in ascending our physical boundaries before the current age ends and new one begins. Some will heed them while others, still in intellectual and emotional denial, will not. With this knowledge and with our acceptance, we will have the opportunity to start over on a clean slate, experience our birthright, and return to a time of no time, or a time of forever, as multidimensional, cosmic beings. And if you don't care to believe this, I can tell you in truth that many of us, including myself, have already begun to experience this shift and encoding, and now walk in multiple realities. We have accomplished this by discerning and rising above the negative influences and energies, and allowing our guides -- the Mayan elders, the ancestors, and the White Brotherhood of our galaxy -- to guide us on our cosmic journey.